Customer Reviews

Earlier this year, I was looking for some well-written chapter books for my six-year-old daughter who at the time was finishing the Step into Reading series of books and had expressed an interest in reading chapter books. My requirements were that the books had to be interesting and engaging with some illustrations to keep her motivated, and above all, well-written with good use of language. Well, I recommend two series of chapter books for young girls ages 6-9 who are beginning to read fluently and independently and are ready for chapter books: the Ivy and Bean series and Judy Moody. Both series of books have great, fun story lines with central characters that children, especially young girls will easily relate to, and engaging illustrations that will appeal to visual readers. The Judy Moody series of books appeals to my daughter because the stories are fun, the chapters are easy to read through (the vocabulary is appropriately pitched for young independent readers embarking on chapter books), and there are lots of interesting illustrations that are detailed and fun to observe. This is especially important given that my daughter is a visual learner and is attracted to pictures and illustrations. This first book in the Judy Moody series focuses on the exploits of Judy Moody, a precocious young girl about to begin third grade. She is initially anxious about going to a new class, and refuses to cooperate with her new teacher Mr. Todd (she rudely calls him Mr. Toad). Over a period of time, Judy comes to realize that change does not necessarily mean something unpleasant and that she can still have fun in a new environment. This is a wonderfully written, fun book about a young child coping with change.
